CONJUROR, sb. Yks. Cor. One able to exorcise the devil or lay ghosts.

n.Yks.¹ The power involved here is, or was until lately, held to reside in the clergy; and I have myself been applied to by a woman, who was sane enough in most points, to lay certain spirits which pertinaciously disturbed her: one the ghost of a deceased 'minister'; another the evil one himself. But the power of the Church-priests, or clergymen of the Church of England, was held to be light, or almost nothing, in comparison with that of the Roman Catholic priests. See Ord's Hist. of Cleveland, p. 301. Cor. When witchcraft is suspected, the person overlooked has immediate recourse to the conjurer, QUILLER-COUCH Hist. Polperro (1871) 146.

[Jewis exorcistis or coniuureris, WYCLIF (1382) Acts xix. 13.]

w.Mid. A line is drawn on the ground, enclosing a rectangular space about a yard long, by half a yard wide. At the other end of the ground a similar figure is drawn, so that the two longest sides face one another at about ten or twelve yards distant. The players are divided into two sides, one side supplying two bowlers, who, standing behind the 'rings,' throw a 'cat' into the ring at the other end of the ground. Two batsmen, with sticks, belonging to the opposing party try to hit the 'cat' away as it approaches them, and if successful, score runs as at cricket. When the 'cat' falls within the 'ring' the batsman of that end is 'out.' Still common (W.P.M.).

CONK, *sb. and v.*¹ Yks. I.Ma. War. Wor. Wil. Slang. Also written konk e.Yks.¹ w.Yks. [kɔŋk.]

1. sb. The nose.

1. A snail-shell; the shell which breaks its opponent in a boys' game; also pl. the game itself (see below). Cf. conger, *sb.*²

e.Yks.¹ In the boys' game of conkers the apexes of two shells are pressed together until one is broken, the owner of the other being the victor. War.³, se.Wor.¹, Shr.¹, e.An.¹, Nrf.¹ Som. SWEETMAN Wincanton Gl. (1885).

2. pl. A game played with horse-chestnuts threaded on a string. Cf. cob-nut, cobbety-cuts, oblionker.

Chs.¹ It is played by two boys who sit face to face astride of a form or a log of timber. If a piece of turf (peat dried for fuel) can be produced so much the better. One boy lays his chestnut upon the turf, and the other strikes at it with his chestnut; and they go on striking alternately till one chestnut splits the other. The chestnut which remains unhurt is then 'conqueror of one.' A new chestnut is substituted for the broken one, and the game goes on. Whichever chestnut now proves victorious becomes 'conqueror of two,' and so on, the victorious chestnut adding to its score all the previous winnings. The chestnuts are often artificially hardened by placing them up the chimney, or carrying them in the warm pocket; and a chestnut which has become conqueror of a considerable number acquires a value in school-boys' eyes, and I have frequently known them to be sold, or exchanged for other toys. s.Chs.¹ War.² Let's go and play at conkers. Wil.¹ w.Som.¹

3. The horse-chestnut which breaks its opponent at the game of 'conkers'; hence gen. a horse-chestnut.

Chs.¹, s.Chs.¹ s.Not. So called by the boys, who bore holes through them and hang them on pieces of string, and then challenge one another to try which can break the other's conquer by striking it with his own. 'Come on! Hev yer got any conquerers!' (J.P.K.) s.Lin. Let's pick up all them conkers (F.H.W.). Oxf. (S.H.); Oxf.¹ MS. add. Wil. A hole is bored in a nut and a string run through it. The boys take it in turn to hold or hit. The nut that smashes the other is 'conk' and counts all its defeated adversary's score as its own (G.E.D.); Wil.¹ Som. SWEETMAN Wincanton Gl. (1885). w.Som.¹ I saw two boys in my grounds throwing stones at a horse-chestnut tree. As soon as they saw me, before I had spoken, both said at once, 'Plairz-r, aay aan u-bün aat'een daew-n dhu kaung-kurz' [Please, sir, I have not been hitting down the chestnuts].

4. Comp. Conker-tree, the horse-chestnut, Aesculus Hippocastanum. Chs.¹, s.Chs.¹, w.Som.¹

5. v. To play the game of 'conkers' either with snail-shells or with horse-chestnuts.

s.Not. Hev yer got any conquerers? Ah'll conquer yer (J.P.K.). Som. There used to be 'conquering' with snail-shells: Southey says 'our schoolboy sports, that of "conquering" with snail-shells. . . . The snail-shells (not tenantless) were pressed point against point until one was broken in,' DOWDEN Southey, 9.

[1. Cp. Fr. conque, the shell of shell-fish (COTGR.).]

COPSIL, sb. Shr. Also written copsal Shr.² [kɒ'psil, kɒ'psl.]

1. Obs. A wedge for keeping the coulter of an old-fashioned wooden plough in its place and at a proper angle to the beam. Also called cop-wedge.

Shr.¹ The copsil, or, as it was sometimes called, the cop-wedge, was gen. attached to the beam of the plough by a short chain to prevent its being lost. When it was taken out of the hole in the beam, through which the coulter passed, the latter would be quite loose and could be removed at pleasure for repairs. The copsil in fastening the coulter was vertical, or nearly so, to the beam. In modern iron-ploughs a horizontal cramp secured by a screw and nut on the opposite side of the beam fulfils the office of the old copsil. Copsils of this kind fell out of use when iron ploughs became general, about 1835-1840.

2. The cramps on the plough-beam, which by means of screws and nuts, secure and adjust the wheels of a plough. Shr.¹

3. A piece of iron welded to the end of the plough-beam, perforated and furnished with pins, for adjusting the width and regulating the draught of the plough. ib.

1. sb. A coward. Also used attrib.

Sc. (JAM.) Nhb.¹ One boy refusing to fight another after a challenge will hear, 'Yo'r a crawdon.' 'A craadon cock,' a cowardly cock. 'Aa once heerd a man tell another he wis a "crawdon hen." Aa understeed him ti mean 'at he wis like a hen 'at tries te craa like a cock.' Chs.²³

Hence Craddenly, adj. and adv. fainthearted, cowardly.

N.Cy.¹, Nhb.¹ Lan. An sarve te reet too, theaw craddinly carl! AINSWORTH Witches (ed. 1849) Introd. iii; RAY (1691); A craddantly lad, BAILEY (1721). Chs.¹²³

2. A daring feat set by boys, such as no 'cradden' would undertake; a challenge; a mischievous trick; a puzzle, riddle. Gen. in phr. to set or lead craddens.

n.Cy. GROSE (1790); N.Cy.¹ Nhb.¹ Obs. w.Yks. Setting a crawden was a fireside amusement by boys and young men setting each other a riddle or a puzzle (F.K.); DYER Dial. (1891) 38; w.Yks.⁵, Chs.¹² n.Lin.¹ Commonly used in a humorous sense. I'll set thee a crawden, my lad.

3. v. To betray cowardice; to show the white feather. N.Cy.¹

4. To outdo in daring; to challenge; also to 'crow over.'

Yks. Who is going to crawden me? (M.N.) w.Yks. He crawdened me to bade i't beck (W.W.P.); 'Crawden' is used when a person assumes something over his peer, HAMILTON Nugae Lit. (1841) 351. s.Lan. PICTON Dial. (1865).

Hence (1) Crawdened, pp. defeated in attempting a difficult feat; (2) Crawdener, sb. the best performer of a difficult boyish feat; (3) Crawdening-match, sb. a contest between boys.

w.Yks.⁵ When a youth declares himself ready to give any of his comrades 'a crawdening match,' the kind of feat is selected, as, climbing a high tree, hopping on one leg up hill, adventuring across a pond by a straight cut, thus taking deep, as well as shallow places; walking, without support, upon a rail, or anything else of a similar nature; and he who climbs the highest, hops farthest, goes the greatest distance across the pond, or the greatest distance upon the rail, is said to be the 'crawdener,' and the defeated (all those who have accepted his challenge) 'crawdened.' Feats of a more dangerous nature are perhaps the most commonly practised, such as 'steepchasing it' over the garden-fence and about the grounds belonging to some irritable character.

[1. I crew abone that craudone, as cok that wer wictour, DUNBAR Poems (c. 1500) ed. Small, II. 40. The word occurs often in Dunbar, written also cradoun. 8. Part of the furniture of a pack-saddle; see below.

Som. (W.F.R.) w.Som.¹ There are two kinds, long crooks and short crooks. The former consist of two long poles bent in a half circle of about eighteen inches in diameter, but with one end much longer than the other. A pair of these bent poles are kept about two feet apart and parallel to each other by five or more rungs. A frame so constructed forms one crook, and a pair of these pairs are slung on the pack-saddle pannier-wise. When in position the long ends of the crooks are upright, and are at least three feet above the horse's back. Being over five feet asunder, a very large quantity of hay, straw, or corn can be loaded on a pack-horse. Short crooks are of the same description, but smaller in capacity and with rungs closer together. They are for heavier materials, such as hard firewood, building stones, &c. It used to be as common to say 'I'll send a horse and crooks' as it now is to say 'horse and cart.' Both kinds are now very rarely seen. Dev. The moormen most commonly convey their peat, and all things else, on what is called a crook, BRAY Desc. Tamar and Tavy (1836) l. 22. n.Dev. 'They'll be awa' inow; they's crying op this ha'f-hour.' (17) Sc. Monthly Mag. (1800) I. 322. (18) Ir. (G.M.H.) Shr. Miss Jackson's MSS. clearly distinguish between 'cutting the neck' at the end of the reaping, and 'crying the mare' at the end of the harvest, which previous writers seem to have confounded together. Crying, calling, or shouting the mare is a ceremony performed by the men of that farm which is the first in any parish or district to finish the harvest. . . . All the men assemble in the stackyard, or better, on the highest ground on the farm, and there shout a dialogue—preceding it by a grand 'Hip, hip, hip, hurrah.' . . . There were of course variations in the details in different places, but it was universally practised, and though dying out, is by no means extinct. . . . At Pulverbatch, Christopher Sandford. . . observed in 1871 that 'they cried the mar' right well this 'ear,' BURNE Flk-Lore (1883) 373-4; Shr.¹; Shr.² When a farmer has ended his reaping and the wooden bottle is passing merrily round, the reapers form themselves into two bands, and commence the following dialogue in loud shouts, or rather a kind of chant, at the utmost pitch of their voice: . . . 'I have her, I have her.' 'What hast thee?' 'A mare, a mare,' &c. In the sc.Shr. . . the last few stalks of the wheat are left standing; all the reapers throw their sickles, and he who cuts it off cries 'I have her.' . . . In 1835 'they cryden the mar awhile I was thire, becous yo sin we'den done harrast fust' (s.v. Mare). (19) w.Som.¹ A bunch of ears is tied together called the neck. Dev. NEILL Idyls (1892) 123. nw.Dev.¹ Dev., Cor. After the wheat is all cut on most farms, the harvest people have a custom of 'crying the neck.' . . . An old man . . . goes round to the shocks and sheaves, and picks out a little bundle of all the best ears he can find; this bundle he ties up very neat and trim. . . . This is called 'the neck.' . . . The reapers . . . stand round in a circle. The person with 'the neck' stands in the centre, grasping it with both his hands. He first stoops and holds it near the ground, and all the men forming the ring take off their hats, stooping . . . towards the ground. . . . Then all begin at once, in a very prolonged and harmonious tone, to cry, 'The neck!' at the same time slowly raising themselves upright, and elevating their arms and hats above their heads; the person with the neck also raising it on high. This is done three times. They then change their cry to 'We yen! we yen!' . . . One of them then gets 'the neck,' and runs as hard as he can down to the farmhouse. . . . The object of crying 'the neck' is to give notice . . . of the end of the harvest, and the meaning of 'we yen' is 'we have ended.' The neck is gen. hung up in the farmhouse, HUNT Pop. Rom. w. Eng. (1865) 385-6, ed. 1896. (20) Shr.² (s.v. Mare). (21) Cor. What d'ee mean by crying stale fish at that rate? 'Q.' Wandering Heath (1895) 11. (22) Shr. BURNE Flk-Lore (1883) 526.

N. & Q.* (1888) I. 195; The cucking-stool was not abolished (in Beverley) until 1750, White Month in Yks. (1888) v. Lan.¹ It was in use in Manchester as late as 1775, and was a wooden chair placed upon a long pole, which was balanced on a pivot, and suspended over a pond called Pool-house and Pool-fold; afterwards it was placed over the Daub-holes (Infirmity pond), and was employed for the punishment of scolds and prostitutes. Chs.¹ A street in Macclesfield is called Cuckstool Pit Hill, at the bottom of which is the river Bollin, where the scolds were ducked; Chs.³ Formerly every parish had its 'Ducking Stool' or 'Cuckie Stool,' a chair placed on a lever, on which a scold was fastened and ducked over and over again, till she was quiet. Der.¹², nw.Der.¹ n.Lin.¹ The use of the cuckstool was only abandoned at Gainsburgh in the last decade of the eighteenth century, STARK Hist. Gainsb. 528. Shr., Hrf. BOUND Provinc. (1876).

Crime* (1885) 300. Lin. Children form a ring with one in the middle, who lays a cushion on the ground. They sing the lines 'We've got a new sister in our degree,' &c., and the child in the centre points at one, and the others dance round singing, . . . the centre child dragging the imaginary Mrs. Sargesson on to the cushion by force, kissing her and leaving her in the centre, GOMME Games (1894) 91. *Lei.*¹ *Nhp.*¹ The cushion dance is still continued with some variations, by the humbler classes, . . . and gen. closes the evening's amusement. One of the young men endeavours secretly to bring in a cushion and locks the door to prevent the escape of the young maidens; then all the party unite hands and dance round three times to the left, and three times to the right, after which the company all seat themselves except the young man who holds the cushion. . . . He goes to the girl he fancies most and drops the cushion at her feet; she kneels down with him on the cushion, and he salutes her and they then rise and dance round and round to the fiddler, II. 438. Dor. At Charminster the game is begun by a single person, who dances about the room with a cushion in his hand, and at the end of the tune stops and sings 'This dance it will no further go,' GOMME Games (1894) 89. CUTLE, v. and sb. Sc. In form cuthil Per. 1. v. In phr. to cutle corn, to carry corn from one field to another, or from one part of a farm to another; see below.

Per., w.Lth. This term is used, not merely as signifying to remove corn out of water-mark, but also to denote its being carried from a less advantageous situation to one that is better, or more convenient to the farmer. Thus, corn is said to be cutled when it is removed from low to high ground, that it may be sooner dried; . . . from a 'lown' or sheltered spot to one that is exposed to the wind. The same term is used when corn is removed from a distant part of a field, or of the farm, to one that is nearer; that when ready to be stacked, or housed, it may not be necessary to fetch it far in bad roads. For it is principally in unfavourable seasons, and in late harvests, that cutling is practised. . . . The term necessarily includes the idea of confining the corn to a smaller place than that which it formerly occupied (JAM.).

2. sb. Corn carried and set up in another place. Per., w.Lth. It is sometimes removed to give liberty to the cattle to eat the 'foggage' (JAM.).

CUTTLE, sb. and *v.*² Yks. [ku'tl.] 1. sb. Woollen-trade term: a layer of cloth when folded, and ready for market.

w.Yks. The folding of doubled cloth, in one pile of folds of the same exact width, placed perpendicularly one over the other, to be sent to market, or the merchant. Cloth so folded was said to be in 'cuttle' (W.T.); The fold of a piece of cloth in the direction of its width (H.H.).

2. v. To pull a warp through the hands and throw it in regular folds or layers, so as gradually to accumulate in a heap.

w.Yks. It [the cloth] is then 'entered' and 'cuttled,' CUDWORTH Bradford (1876) 356; (J.G.); (R.H.R.); w.Yks.³ First a small portion is doubled, then another upon it (not round it), and so on until it is all doubled up; finally wrap the end, left first or last, round all. The reasons for adopting this mode are, that the cloth is supposed to keep best; it is easier to unfold for show purposes; it piles best.

Hence Cuttling, vbl. sb. putting a piece of cloth into folds ready for warehousing.

w.Yks. This is done by folding several folds of cloth one on another, for the purpose of getting a better handle of the material (J.M.); (H.H.).

Lon. It took me just five months to learn the cymbal, if you please—the hurdy-gurdy ain't its right name, MAYHEW Lond. Labour (1851) III. 160, ed. 1861.

2. An instrument used in catching birds, &c., by night. Also in comp. Cymbal-net; see below.

Lan. I believe the instrument used was composed of a triangular piece of steel wire, on which were suspended several iron rings, which on being struck with a rod of wood, gave forth a sound which by courtesy might be called music. This kind of cymbal was long in use among gipsies, N. & Q. (1874) 5th S. i. 192. [The chief product of Kittiwake's night work on the marshes were obtained by his cymbal-nets. Wild birds were brought down by decoys, and . . . the net . . . was rapidly pulled over and the game secured, WATSON Nature Wdcraft (1890) xvii.]

3. v. In phr. cymbing for bees, larks, &c., a method of making bees settle, or catching birds by night.

Yks. The phr. 'cymbing for bees' is still in use, and is applied to the common method for making bees settle, N. & Q. (1874) 5th S. i. 94. Lan. Cymbing for larks was wont to be used as a very common pastime; now, however, it is scarcely known by name. THORNBURGH Hist. Blackpool (1837) 90.
